What is Clearly Provide Opinion and Information

Do you recognize yourself in the following? You are in a discussion, and while talking you come to a conclusion but your audience look confused? You verbosity creates confusion rather than clarification. Or you immediately provide your final thoughts in a work meeting with the result that the rest look at you questioning: there is a big chance that the others could not follow your internal logic. Your oral and written communication will benefit from clarity.

You get to hear you that you argue verbosely or that others can not follow your conclusions. You want to change this: both in your written and oral communication. You want to be completely clearly followed in your argumentation and provision of information. In this competency training you learn ways to differentiate between primary and secondary issues and provide structure in your thought process.

After the training:

- - You can be clear and specific in your argumentation
 - You recognize the essence in your own and other people's stories
 - You know how to provide the essence of a logical foundation according to a structural composition
 - You can use structure to be clear and concise in both spoken and written word
